

Activation Audit

Sample deliverable · the format, not a real client

1. Define the moment

Signups are vanity until someone reaches the point where the product visibly works. Name that single action precisely. Not 'completed onboarding' ? the specific thing that makes a user think: oh, I see it.

2. Measure who gets there

What percentage of signups reach that moment within seven days? Most teams have never measured this and are surprised by the answer. Whatever the number is, it is the ceiling on everything your marketing spend can achieve.

3. Cut the distance

- ? Every signup field not strictly required to deliver first value
- ? Every empty state that shows a blank screen instead of realistic sample data
- ? Every step requiring a teammate, an admin, or an integration before anything works at all

4. The repeatable win

Pre-populate new accounts with realistic demo data so the product is never empty on first open. This single change moves activation more reliably than any onboarding checklist, tour, or email sequence I have seen.
